Changes to how your pension contributions are calculated

What’s changing and why it matters

There are different ways to calculate how much goes into your pension each payday.

Until now, your contributions have been based on qualifying earnings. This means only part of your salary (everything above a lower earnings limit of £6,240) counts towards your pension.

Soon, contributions will be based on basic pay. This means your full salary is included.

What this means for you

You and your employer will both contribute a little more – helping your pension grow faster over time.

Here’s an example

	Qualifying earnings	Basic pay
Annual salary	£30,000	£30,000
Annual pensionable earnings	£23,760 (lower earnings limit of £6,240 removed)	£30,000
Annual employee contribution (5%)	£1,188	£1,500
Annual employer contribution (3%)	£712.80	£900

In this example, that’s £499 more into your pension each year, while your take-home pay only reduces by around £26 per month.

That includes an extra £187.20 from your employer and is money that goes straight into your future.
